We have come a long way – but we still have a long way to go. So many in our community still experience challenges or job discrimination, or they aren't able to fully participate fully in the economy and government to which we have contributed so much.

The city's high-crash corridors are where some of our most economically and racially diverse communities live and work - yet these urban arterials are where people are dying just to cross the street to catch their bus or to get to work or to school.

I have hope for this change and for our community and public safety leaders who lean into community during these times so we can learn and do better, and I have hope for the presence of peace and justice – it starts and ends with all of us.

The real question before us is: What are we each doing to move us toward this vision, instead of moving backward?

Sonya Massey should still be alive, and I join so many others in condemning this senseless, horrendous killing by a law enforcement officer, including Mayor Wheeler, Chief Day, Portland NAACP President Posey, Pastor Wisner, and others in our community.

We must continue facing the truths of our history and present-day actions. We still have a long way to go toward achieving full justice in our country, and elected officials have a responsibility to listen and act in response to community calls for change.

I have also been working with Mayor Wheeler to consider additional actions such as targeted traffic calming methods around the park; increased police presence through a model that works with community on shared expectations; and further fee reductions for event activation.

We have to step in and support the work that our city and community are already doing together, and ensure a safe place for all to gather.

One of the first major items I passed in Council invested millions in gun violence prevention and intervention efforts. It is a priority of mine to see those continue.

Today I attended a gathering with our Black community leaders regarding the recent shooting events at Dawson Park. It was clear to me that, while gun violence is reducing across the city, we need to take additional action.
