Today we celebrated completion of installation of new public trash cans in North Portland, adorned with beautiful images from artists like Alex Chiu and Latoya Lovely. Clean, well-maintained public spaces bolster economic prosperity and give our neighborhoods a sense of pride.

In 2019, Portland had 758 public trash cans, mostly downtown. Now you can find nearly 1,400 public trash cans across the city, with expansion into neighborhood centers where there was previously no public collection service to keep these communities clean and healthy.

The Public Trash Can program is a shining example of the great things we can accomplish when government works with neighbors and businesses to implement programs that truly meet their needs.

We also need to reduce the root causes of crime by creating safe, healthy communities. We must catalyze housing development and increase access to parks, greenspaces, and recreation and social activities that build strong communities where neighbors know each other.

This project embodies what community transformation can and should look like with the right alignment of resources and partnerships — and it does that in a neighborhood that offers amenities and opportunities that should be available to Portlanders of all income levels.

Beyond the immediate help we can give, the city's response to the next extreme heat event must go hand-in-hand with meaningful, long-term work to decarbonize our economy, improve community resiliency, and enhance our tree canopy to reduce urban heat islands.

Our current housing crisis requires a fresh ideas that can help build new over two years makes sense and is an example of a change we can make to help solve our housing needs.
